CHICAGO.

"I swear I never," said a prominent man yesterday, "thought there was such a thing as weather until now. Weather-rooks were to me mere idle toys, but now they have a significance—and meaning which is fraught with terrible possibilities." It will be seen at a glance that it was the manager of a theatre who was talking in this way, and, next to a weather-rook, a man who has been the author of the last heating barometer. He sees a cloud no bigger than a man's hand in the sky, he expels a possible hurricane, and invites us to come to him in safety. But when the black, stagnant, benighted, cloudy, breathless inactivity overcomes humanity—then he takes a lemming and runs home to bed, puts his feet up, and says, "Well, what do you think?—that everything is going to the devil. So do many people who are not managers. Yesterday was a day of hopes and fears. It was breezy, but not hot; it was cool, but not refreshing; it was coming from the right air. The "air" was all right, only the breeze didn't come, and the people were once more pinched into gloom. And the people, modified by occasional breezes, and, on the whole, the citizens—who took proper precautions about the weather, had no reason to complain about the weather. It was, however, some through the heat, and, in the evening particularly balmy and refreshing.

ROUND LAKE.

A PROGRESSIVE CAMP CITY IN THE WOODS.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

ROUND LAKE, N. Y., July 17.—The annual visitor to the lake woods finds change.

He has to find some just now, if he is going into the grounds; for during the Sunday school assembly an admission fee is the first thing on the programme. No use to try to get in surreptitiously, for, besides the sharp-picketed fence, there is an unusually strict police force. Having little or nothing to do in this characteristically and essentially moral and well-conducted place, they are all the time trying to find some way to prove their efficiency. Every one has to be active here, since that is the chief feature of the movement. When President Hillman gets a new project into his head—and he can never be caught without having a project—he does not stop at expense, but calls the Trustees together and asks them to consider it. As the Trustees always think as Mr. Hillman does, and as he is ready to freely use his own fortune when the funds in the Treasury get low, his ideas are generally worked out into effective form.

Nothing but pluck, energy, and a deal of money could have made Round Lake what it is to-day.

RAPID PROGRESS.

Ten years ago it was a desolate piece of woods, with underbrush so thick that passage had to be cut through with an ax; and almost by chance it was that a committee appointed by a local camp-meeting association selected it as a good site whereon to pitch their tents for a brief season. Joseph Hillman was in the camp, and he had a plan for a hotel, and had it built in this section of country, and he was also a keen business man, with a fortune earned by hard work, and a sharp eye for favorable opportunity. He entered heart and soul into an enterprise which appealed to his taste, as well as his pocket. To-day Round Lake is a city of cottages and tents, with stores, hotel, and the prettiest depot on the Rensselaer & Saratoga Railroad, exceeding the one at Saratoga; with steam, gas, good drainage, and the best of food and fresh air. MURAT'S TEMPERANCE-LECTURE.

Then sprung up the bold Murat Halestad,
And, in his bold, clear water;

"O do not drink cold water!

When spring-time comes, my own;

"I will start your nile,

And make you grim and green;

"Or, if you like, peppermint,

Along the ake, in winter.

And steep it well in whisky,

In summer-time, my dear,

Though it bubbles up;

So crystal and so clear;

But crystal, I am assured,

Ice-water needs its condition;

And water, its heart-beat;

Ice-water is the best, dear;

Unless it mix it with Bourbon.

"Do not drink ice-water!

In winter-time, my dear;

When water and damp,

Will give you fits,

And rheumatism, you bet;

Take a little lemon,

Forgetting not some Cognac;

To cover its cruelty;

Or, if you like, a drop,

Unless it has with brandy.

"Do not drink ice-water!

When autumn-breezes blow,

And call the boys from the farm,

And make the kitchen hum;

Let me tell you, because,

Because you should not drak at all."

Then down at the bold Murat Halestad,

And a very good lecture, they all said.

WHAT DO I WEEP?

Why do I weep? Whenever come all these tears
That fall from my eyes?—I weep for the dead,
The still stronger grow my hopes, still less my fears,
And happiest moments of my life begone!—
What! That you are dead?—Why then, why prolong?
Master, know'd that then there are but the singers of songs.

These cleanse the spirits "tis fit to roam
Through Poet's walks, along her green ways,
Scouting the woods, and basking in fair bowers,
Whiling away the happiness of all happy hours?

And still the tear fall fast, still faster fall,
And still mine eyes look up to fair scenes;

Earth and things earthly have begun to pale,

And now am I fated to wait and dread of death,

Father, mother, ground, death, fairies, fairies,

And many more, too many more.

Pathetic, tragic, ground, death, fairies, fairies,

And many more, too many more.

Lies clad in leafy boughs,

But get you some molasses,

And make some sugar, sugar,

And make the kitchen hum;

Let me tell you, because,

Because you should not drak at all."

Then down at the bold Murat Halestad,

And a very good lecture, they all said.

UNDER THE MAPLES.

[no.]

"Mid the soft shadows of twilight creeps

Fancy's soft spell, and mingles with subtle dreams;

Ah! how the world seems dim, while white, while white,

While Men're, star-like, o'er my spirit beam;

Bright are the visions that remembrance fashions,

Pooping the dream-world where my fancy strays;

But fairer, more fair than fairest dreams, the

Of that that now on Mom'r's throne hold sway.

As in the blue and vanished done one star

Amid its sisters blent more brightly,

The morn's thoughts of time and shade, amid

The morn's thoughts of time and shade, amid

Through the dark chamber of my soul.

Am so, When fades the day and its dull care, on wings

Of Mem'r's own I wif my thoughts to them,

And faint, and fainter, by the day, below

Blest—beautifull.

ON A PIAZZA.

The Young Man of To-Day and Daniel Deronda.

Rhadamanthus on the Atlantic Monthly for August.

A Few New York Women Blunders in Her Estimate of New England Women.

Great Robbery of Jewels.

From Our Own Correspondent.
NEWPORT, R. I., July 17.—Somebody has said somewhere and "somewhere" that a piazza well stocked with idle pleasure-seekers is the background of all Newport life and the beginning and end of all Newport stories, whether real life or fiction. This is put it very broadly, not to say satirically. But given a piazza, and I admit that the plazas and galleries really give them a certain air of distinction, or at least the group of persons who in Newport invariably come under that head, I have seen some of the hardest workers—literary people or school-teachers generally—congregated together on one of these plazas, and because it is the rule that the habits of Newport are fashionable pleasure-seekers, the outside tourists visiting world immediately pronounced these workers

I know nothing of this sort. On its wide floor, beneath its shady roof, three or four friends are gathered together night and morning. All three, though in the world in a certain sense, and of it in another sense, are workers in their various ways. One is literary, the other artistic, partly in the broad-writing sense, and partly in the amateur, but workers all the same. To this piazza come one or twice, or sometimes thrice a week other workers, and here are discussed all sorts of topics of the day, from a critical point of view, to the last complication of the literature question. Yesterday there was Brunette and Blondine, and a general Rhadamanthus with the rest of the company. Rhadamanthus started the ball of conversation by bringing forth the advance sheets of the Atlantic Monthly and stirring up the old fire of argument about Deronda, which I believe comes to life every three months or so at some word of some passing reader.

Rhadianthus, coming in after breakfast with a big mail, sits, directing his conversation more especially to Blondine, whom he knows will be specially pleased with what he has to communicate. "Here is Deronda again," says Blondine, looking alert, and assumes a wistful aspect. She is one of the few real women who dislike the homey, sentimental Atlantic.

"I am tired, terribly tired, of the everlasting homage that is poured out at the feet of THAT soulless man."

The rest of the company are excluded. The rest of the company immediately spring into attention. The battle-ground is all ready. "Deronda," begins Brunette, "is a scoundrel, a scoundrel, a scoundrel, when Rhadamanthus interrupts with, 'Wait a minute and you'll all be suited.' Here is a writer who manages to give us both sides, though it is easy to tell which side her prejudice lies on."

"I hate such!" cries Blondine, to be overruled by Rhadamanthus.

"In fact, we all read 'One Too Many,' by Miss Otis, who wrote two or three years ago a novel called 'Loveless Illness,'—a very pretty novel, but the locale so very pink, so smothered in the roses, so sweet, so sentimental, that it does not live and cheat it is about as much reality as a fairy story. This tale, however, of 'One Too Many,' though it moves along,

THE HIGH JINKS OF FIFTH AVENUE PARTIES, and with people who run off to Europe and back again as easily as ordinary people go down-town, has a certain ring of truth about it. I do not care to tell the story itself, though it is admirably adapted to the season, and to this day it is still the best of the Atlantic life. But I want to go on to Deronda, who is a lady of the highly organized type, as we say, of the pretty bratty women, who are always on the high key of the mental emotions, who is putting her foot in her mouth a little each time on her return from Europe:

"What did you read?"

"Oh, I read part of 'Daniel Deronda.' You know that I am fond of the Atlantic. For time it so long; accordingly, I went through the first volume and began the second."

"I could stand Deronda. I really couldn't, you know. Does it die before the end of the book?"

"Yes. In that case I will finish it. I want to know what becomes of Gwen, the other little Gwen, do you? But Deronda is a superduper and a bore."

"Monroe is a loquacious enthusiast."

"I am not so much enthused as enthusiastic; I feel sorry for anybody for gone is pulmonary consumption, but all that he has done is to make me feel sorry for him more seriously."

"So unfeeling for Deronda, he can't abide the fellow; still, I confess to a profound pity for him, and a desire to see him a decent man—holding him with his glittering eyes and—"

"I don't like Deronda!" cried Irene. Her face scarlet, she ever likes two flames."

"Of course I don't like Deronda. Do you?"

"I do. I am fond of the Atlantic. I would like the ground he trod on! He is my purest and loftiest ideal of a man."

Irene blushed and added, "I dare say. But assure your lotions and perfume is accustomed prig."

"A prig. What else is a prig—a man who sets up fine, prepossessing dispositions to be better than the rest of us? I am fond of the Atlantic. We were not enough to be a braggartish prig. I hear he finally turns out to be a Jew. A pragmatist, perhaps, who believes in the right of self-expression."

"I don't wonder when we turn out to be a Jew. But I am fond of the Atlantic. I want to convince you. I want you to have an instinctive conception of the good, the true, the beautiful."

"I am fond of the Atlantic. I am fond of the good, the true, the beautiful."
